Full-Size Promotional Alien Queen Made from Original Molds †Δ
Aliens (1986)

A full-size Alien Queen replica from the promotion of James Cameron's sci-fi action sequel Aliens. Ripley (Sigourney Weaver) came face to face with the Alien Queen while searching for Newt (Carrie Henn). The Queen then pursued the two back to the USS Sulaco, where Ripley managed to blast her out of the airlock.

The original Alien Queen was designed and created by Cameron and creature-effects legend Stan Winston. This particular model was commissioned by film studio 20th Century Fox in 1993 to promote the release of the Alien Trilogy VHS box set. Built at Pinewood Studios from the original production moulds, it was constructed by sculptor Bruce Hansing, who did the fibreglassing, alongside Dave Chagouri and Oscar-winner Dave Elsey, who together performed the foam work. Chagouri had worked on Aliens, and both he and Elsey were on the crew of David Fincher's Alien³. The model is one of four created in total.

It is predominantly made of fibreglass, with foam arms, hands and tail, the latter of which sweeps down from the back of the body and is held with a metal strut. Four new spines have been added to the back to complete the display. One tooth is missing. There is some wear from age and use, as well as scuffs and scratches to the paintwork, chips to the fibreglass, and small holes on some parts of the Queen. The model is mounted to a metal scaffold.
